Citing the land disposal contract with NASA in June 1966, officials of the Cambridge City Council voted to challenge MIT’s plans to use the NASA center as a defense research facility. The vote was a rebuke to MIT officials, who had earlier agreed to sell the property unless NASA closed its doors by the end of the year. The vote is the result of a controversy that has simmered for more than a year. In a statement released last week, the City Council said that it had decided to challenge the plans because they would have adverse effects on the city’s economy. It deplored the decision because the Center was expected to generate economic activity, and it expressed concern that the Center would have adverse effects on the city’s tax roles. A broadly-based citizens committee, led by City Manager James L. Lamson, termed the closing “a savage kind of political retaliation.” The closing was termed “disastrous” by the City Council, which rejected this and said they would support the Center’s activities.

The conference began with an address by David D. Dominick, Commissioner of the Federal Water Pollution Control Administration, and a high school teacher from Maine. The conference was attended by representatives from colleges and universities all over the nation, including MIT. The conference was sponsored by the Federal Water Pollution Control Administration, the National Science Foundation, and the National Academy of Sciences.

They are living well, which is one of the many bad things. Our cities are in awful shape. The government is doing nothing to fix them. The economy is in bad shape, and the environment is in worse shape. The American people are in bad shape, and the American economy is in worse shape. The American government is in bad shape, and the American economy is in worse shape. The American people are in bad shape, and the American economy is in worse shape. The American government is in bad shape, and the American economy is in worse shape. The American people are in bad shape, and the American economy is in worse shape. The American government is in bad shape, and the American economy is in worse shape. The American people are in bad shape, and the American economy is in worse shape. The American government is in bad shape, and the American economy is in worse shape. The American people are in bad shape, and the American economy is in worse shape. The American government is in bad shape, and the American economy is in worse shape. The American people are in bad shape, and the American economy is in worse shape. The American government is in bad shape, and the American economy is in worse shape. The American people are in bad shape, and the American economy is in worse shape.