Workers feel divestment may be necessary move

By Robert Elkin

Once considered heroes by the majority of staff members, the I-Labs have come under fire recently as the laboratories face an uncertain future. This past weekend, the labs began formal operations after a series of interviews with panel members.

The interview panel was composed entirely of faculty, members of the special laboratories. The panel was charged with reviewing new contracts, to a large extent military, for the special laboratories. The panel was also charged with reviewing the process of divestment and the future of the special laboratories.

A majority of engineers and technicians believe that divestment will be inevitable, and that the special laboratories should be divested of all military contracts. However, many staff members feel that the I-Labs have done a proper job of handling the divestment process, and believe that the laboratories should be allowed to keep their military contracts.

David Hoog, member of the panel and director of the Apollo program, said, "I believe that the special laboratories should be divested of all military contracts." However, Richard Haltmaier, group leader, at IL-6, commented on the divestment process, saying, "I think that the laboratories should be allowed to keep their military contracts.

Several engineers feel that the laboratories should be allowed to keep their military contracts, and that the government wants the laboratories to continue their research. However, many staff members feel that the special laboratories should be allowed to keep their military contracts, and that the government wants the laboratories to continue their research.

Engineers want DOD research to continue
