BU students ordered out

More than one thousand BU students were ordered out last night to continue the strike over the student body voted in a poll of the students. The strike, which was started on April 13 to protest the planned rotation of the college's ROTC program, has now entered its third day. The students are demanding the institution of a new grading system, the removal of the ROTC program from the campus, and the immediate withdrawal of all U.S. troops from Southeast Asia. They are also calling for a moratorium on the war in Vietnam.

More than one hundred students from the Boston area are also deeply involved in the strike. They include members of the Boston University Student Association, the Boston College Student Union, and the Northeast Student Coalition. The strike is being supported by a wide range of organizations, including the American Federation of Teachers, the National Education Association, and the American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees.

Faculty strike group

The faculty strike group, which has opened a national debate on the role of universities in society, is expected to continue its activities in the coming days. The group has already called for a nationwide boycott of the ROTC program and has called on universities to divest of companies doing business with the U.S. government.

The group is also calling for a moratorium on the war in Vietnam and for the immediate withdrawal of all U.S. troops from Southeast Asia.
