Sullivan unveils plans to fight unemployment

By Bruce Peetz
James L. Sullivan, former City Manager, announced his plan to address the problem of unemployment in Lowell.

His first goal is to allocate $22 billion to the Lowell area over the next ten years, and to direct that money to the following programs:

1. Train new workers in the skills necessary for new jobs.
2. Allocate money to the construction of new factories and warehouses.
3. Invest in new recreation facilities for the residents of Lowell.
4. Help establish a new college for the residents of Lowell.

The money could then be used to solve technical problems in the area, and to allocate funds from the Economic Development Authority for setting up new industries in Lowell. The City Manager feels that the money could be used to solve problems in the area, and to allocate funds from the Economic Development Authority for setting up new industries in Lowell.

Sullivan's plan is also in line with a National Science Foundation study recently conducted, which showed that the money could be used to solve technical problems in the area, and to allocate funds from the Economic Development Authority for setting up new industries in Lowell.

Sullivan estimated that $30 billion could be used for such a city in Lowell, and said that money could be used to solve technical problems in the area, and to allocate funds from the Economic Development Authority for setting up new industries in Lowell.

The money could then be used to solve technical problems in the area, and to allocate funds from the Economic Development Authority for setting up new industries in Lowell.

The City Manager feels that the money could be used to solve technical problems in the area, and to allocate funds from the Economic Development Authority for setting up new industries in Lowell.

Sullivan's plan is also in line with a National Science Foundation study recently conducted, which showed that the money could be used to solve technical problems in the area, and to allocate funds from the Economic Development Authority for setting up new industries in Lowell.