Winston-F: Special to The Tech

There is every indication that the Senate will devote the next week to "extended discussion" of the proposal for the proposed supersonic transport (SST) appropriation in the wake of a Senate-Department of Transportation rejection of the full amount of $290 million requested by the Department of Transportation (DOT) and Friday's House-Senate conference committee compromise on $210 million for continued funding of the project in this fiscal year.

Leaders of the forces opposed to the continued funding of the SST project asserted that one of the main reasons for the final 54-21 vote in the Senate deleting all additional funds for the project was the ousting of grass roots against the mounting-project for various economic and ecological reasons. In their view, this support must be continued if the project is to be defeated at this juncture.

Possible outcomes of the intense political maneuvering undereway are Senate approval of the compromise funding of $210 million, return of the bill to the conference committee for further reductions, or the rejection of the amount of project support, or continuance of the extended discussion until the end of the current session of Congress. Since the last possibility would entail the loss of the entire $2.5 billion DOT appropriation, some sections of which (such as those dealing with mass transit) are supported by the anti-SST lobby, it is unlikely that the debate will be allowed to continue for any inordinate amount of time.

One "well-placed" and extremely reliable source maintained that there was a reasonable chance of an eventual entire SST appropriation. At this time it is far too early to predict the outcome, but the results should become apparent during the coming week.
