Letters to The Tech

To the Editor:

The really sad thing about this whole affair is not the power or the money or the resources of the MIT Corporation, but the loss of respect for the students who are not even a part of the decision-making process. The Corporation's actions against the student body have always been justified by the need to maintain the image of MIT. However, this time, the Corporation has been forced to act in order to save the company from losing its reputation in the eyes of the public.

It is unfortunate that MIT has chosen to act in this way, as it has always been proud of its reputation as a leader in technology. The Corporation has always been known for its dedication to innovation and excellence, and it is disappointing to see it compromise on these principles in order to save its image.

The Corporation's actions have been met with criticism from both the student body and the public. Many people feel that the Corporation has acted in an unfair and arbitrary manner, and that it has not taken into account the opinions of those who have been affected by its actions. The Corporation has been accused of being out of touch with the needs of the students and the community, and of being more concerned with its own interests than with the welfare of those it claims to serve.

The Corporation has been urged to reconsider its actions, and to work with the students and the community to find a solution that is fair and just. It is hoped that the Corporation will take this advice to heart, and that it will work to improve its relationship with the students and the community.

Sincerely,

Jerry Meldrum

To the Editor:

The Corporation's actions against the students have been met with widespread condemnation. The Corporation's decision to terminate the contracts of the students who were involved in the protest is seen as a clear attempt to silence dissent and stifle free speech. The Corporation's actions have been criticized as being an attempt to silence political dissent and to suppress the rights of the students.

The Corporation has been urged to reconsider its actions, and to work with the students and the community to find a solution that is fair and just. It is hoped that the Corporation will take this advice to heart, and that it will work to improve its relationship with the students and the community.

Sincerely,

Jerry Meldrum
