Nixon administration seeks youth input

(Ed. Note - The following article, written by Joseph J. Blatchford for the Washington Post, seemed like an administrative report on young people and the Nixon administration. But the copy letter from Herbert Klein, Director of Communications for the Executive, Branch, according to a covering letter from Herbert Klein, director of ACTION, an arm of the government's latest attempt to involve the youth, is a major attempt to forge a connection between the youth and the government. The Executive, Branch, according to the covering letter from Herbert Klein, is a seeking increased input from the broader community in the area of educational policy.)

The youth gap is a generation gap, to which the young are responding with urgency. The government is responding with urgency. Nixon administration is trying to forge a connection between the youth and the government by sponsoring "University Year for ACTION," a program designed to bring young people into the mainstream of American life. The program is intended to help Indians in South Dakota and Nebraska to deliver health services and education to those who need them most.

The program is intended to help young people who are not in school to gain work experience in the community. By working in the community, they can develop their skills and become more fit for the work that awaits them. The program is intended to help Indians in South Dakota and Nebraska to deliver health services and education to those who need them most.

The program is intended to help young people who are not in school to gain work experience in the community. By working in the community, they can develop their skills and become more fit for the work that awaits them. The program is intended to help Indians in South Dakota and Nebraska to deliver health services and education to those who need them most.

The program is intended to help young people who are not in school to gain work experience in the community. By working in the community, they can develop their skills and become more fit for the work that awaits them. The program is intended to help Indians in South Dakota and Nebraska to deliver health services and education to those who need them most.

The program is intended to help young people who are not in school to gain work experience in the community. By working in the community, they can develop their skills and become more fit for the work that awaits them. The program is intended to help Indians in South Dakota and Nebraska to deliver health services and education to those who need them most.