The Silent Witness

by Richard Harmon

One of the most important—and tragic—events to occur on the MIT campus over the last few months was the LSD-related hallucination suffered by a student who, in a sense, was a symbol of MIT. The student was a junior in the electrical engineering program, and he had become involved in the MIT student body, particularly in the Student Council and the MIT Daily Chronicle. He had been taking LSD for about two months, and on June 27, 1969, he died of a massive LSD-related hallucination.

The student had been a regular user of LSD, and had become increasingly involved with the MIT student body. He had been a member of the MIT Daily Chronicle, and had been involved in various student organizations. He had been taking LSD for about two months, and on June 27, 1969, he died of a massive LSD-related hallucination.

The student had been a regular user of LSD, and had become increasingly involved with the MIT student body. He had been a member of the MIT Daily Chronicle, and had been involved in various student organizations. He had been taking LSD for about two months, and on June 27, 1969, he died of a massive LSD-related hallucination.

The student had been a regular user of LSD, and had become increasingly involved with the MIT student body. He had been a member of the MIT Daily Chronicle, and had been involved in various student organizations. He had been taking LSD for about two months, and on June 27, 1969, he died of a massive LSD-related hallucination.

The student had been a regular user of LSD, and had become increasingly involved with the MIT student body. He had been a member of the MIT Daily Chronicle, and had been involved in various student organizations. He had been taking LSD for about two months, and on June 27, 1969, he died of a massive LSD-related hallucination.

The student had been a regular user of LSD, and had become increasingly involved with the MIT student body. He had been a member of the MIT Daily Chronicle, and had been involved in various student organizations. He had been taking LSD for about two months, and on June 27, 1969, he died of a massive LSD-related hallucination.