Letters to The Tech

To the editor:

This letter is to point out to the readers of The Tech that there may be a tendency on the part of some student editors or columnists to indicate a certain bias toward certain candidates for the Democratic primary nomination. The reason for this is that student editors or columnists may be influenced by the campaign and the candidates' statements, which may be biased in some way. Therefore, it is important for the readers to be aware of this tendency and to critically evaluate the information presented.

Sincerely yours,

Larry Klein

Report on Wisconsin Primaries

By Peter Peckarsky

The Wisconsin primary was of major interest to the Democratic Party, especially in light of the defeat of Senator George McGovern in the 1972 presidential primary. The Wisconsin primary was held in May 1972, and the results were significant for the Democratic party.

The primary was won by Senator Edmund Muskie of Maine, who went on to finish third in the presidential primary. Muskie was able to build on his strong showing in the New Hampshire primary, which was held two weeks earlier. This was due in part to Muskie's ability to connect with voters in rural areas and to his strong campaign organization.

Muskie's victory was significant for several reasons. First, it was a strong showing for a candidate who was not considered a front-runner before the primary. Second, it was a sign of the growing movement against the Vietnam War, which was a major issue in the campaign. Finally, it was a sign of the popularity of the anti-war candidates, who were doing well in the Democratic primaries.

Muskie's victory was a boost for the anti-war movement, and it was a sign of the growing divide between the parties. It was also a sign of the growing importance of the primary system in the Democratic Party.

Sincerely yours,

Victor B. Goodrich, Jr.

New Hampshire to Wisconsin

By Wallace Adams

The New Hampshire primary was held on March 14, 1972, and it was a major test for the Democratic candidates. The primary was won by Senator Eugene McCarthy, who had a strong showing in the state. However, the primary was also significant for the candidates who did not do well.

Muskie, who had won the New Hampshire primary, did not do as well in the Wisconsin primary. This was due in part to the fact that Muskie had not been as effective in campaigning in rural areas. However, Muskie was able to build on his strong showing in the New Hampshire primary, which was held two weeks earlier. This was due in part to Muskie's ability to connect with voters in rural areas and to his strong campaign organization.

Muskie's victory was significant for several reasons. First, it was a strong showing for a candidate who was not considered a front-runner before the primary. Second, it was a sign of the growing movement against the Vietnam War, which was a major issue in the campaign. Finally, it was a sign of the popularity of the anti-war candidates, who were doing well in the Democratic primaries.

Muskie's victory was a boost for the anti-war movement, and it was a sign of the growing divide between the parties. It was also a sign of the growing importance of the primary system in the Democratic Party.

Sincerely yours,

Victor B. Goodrich, Jr.