VP denies shake-up

By Alex Makowski

It is, if anything, somewhat of a surprise that MIT has not announced any dramatic shake-up in the MIT Campus Police. It has been a somewhat quiet year in the MIT campus police department, with the exception of the recent resignation of Captain Tom Olivieri. However, the MIT administration has not taken any action to replace him, nor has it announced any plans to do so.

The Administration's inaction is understandable, given the current political climate. The Administration is under pressure to maintain a stable and predictable police force, and it is unlikely to take any action that could be perceived as disrupting the campus community.

In addition, the Administration is likely to be concerned about the cost of any changes it might make. The MIT Police Department is already one of the most expensive in the country, and any significant changes could lead to increased costs.

Despite the Administration's inaction, there are some concerns about the police department. For example, there have been reports of inadequate training and poor communication among police officers.

But overall, it seems that the Administration is content with the status quo. The police department is well staffed and well equipped, and it is unlikely that any significant changes will be made in the near future.

But the Administration must be careful not to become complacent. The police department must continue to be vigilant and responsive to the needs of the campus community. It is essential that the Administration take any necessary steps to ensure the safety and security of the campus.