Wheras it seems wise that all activists of the undergraduate students of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology should be so organized as to be under the review and control of the undergraduate students;

Whereas it is right that the undergraduate students of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology should be organized to make their views known to and act with their fellow students and groups of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology whose decisions affect undergraduate students;

Therefore it seems necessary that the entire body of undergraduate students of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology form a committee in order that legislative, executive, judicial and representative powers be conferred on its members as follows:

Preparatory to the Undergraduate Ass., Constitution (The Tech, 3/14/69)

This expresses the principles that guided the framers of the present undergraduate Constitution; just as certainly, these words reflect the times that gave birth to the Constitution. Concern for the democratic control of institutions and the growing interest of graduate students in the governance of institutions stand out as stark reminders of the issues of that year. However, times have changed. Many of the concerns of that year are gone and now longer have the body once do on MIT undergraduates. In fact, student governance has gone from MIT as a whole. It does not truly represent students, nor does it govern. The General Assembly

By Neil Cohen

The student constitution established a representative form of government for the undergraduate student body. However, it is clear that the Constitution was written to reflect the times that gave birth to the Constitution. Concern for the democratic control of institutions and the growing interest of graduate students in the governance of institutions stood out as stark reminders of the issues of that year. However, times have changed. Many of the concerns of that year are gone and now longer have the body once do on MIT undergraduates. In fact, student governance has gone from MIT as a whole. It does not truly represent students, nor does it govern.

Letters to The Tech

To the editor:

I would like to protest the strong negative bias which has been directed towards "Scientist promotes New Rural Sociology" by Jane Schindler. In speaking of the many problems caused by overcrowding in cities (the "incubator effect" of "The Overcrowded City" by William Ogburn), the author expounded on what he termed "the impact of urbanization on sex, sexuality, violence, and general neurotic behavior." This segment of the article seems to me to promote a negative image of the rural society.

With respect to the ranking of the evils caused by overcrowding, or using it as a reason for leaving the city for the countryside, I find this notion to be offensive. I am a rural New Englander born and raised on a farm, and I believe that the countryside offers a better quality of life than the city. I also believe that the countryside offers more opportunities for personal growth and development than the city. Therefore, I believe that the countryside is a better place to live than the city. I also believe that the countryside offers more opportunities for personal growth and development than the city.

The UA: who governs whom?

By Stan Tillotson

The Undergraduate Association (UAP) is the umbrella organization of the undergraduate, graduate, and professional student groups at MIT. It is elected by the undergraduate students, and its members are responsible for representing the interests of the undergraduate student body. The UAP is composed of several committees, including the Senate, the General Assembly, and the Executive Committee. The Senate is composed of representatives from each of the undergraduate student groups, while the General Assembly is composed of all undergraduate students. The Executive Committee is composed of the president, vice-president, and secretary of the UAP. The UAP is responsible for debating and voting on the legislation proposed by its committees, as well as for electing the officers of the UAP. The UAP is also responsible for organizing and running the student elections, as well as for representing the undergraduate student body to the administration and the Board of Trustees. The UAP is the only organization of the undergraduate student body that is elected by the undergraduate students, and it is the only organization that has the power to represent the interests of the undergraduate student body. The UAP is the only organization of the undergraduate student body that is elected by the undergraduate students, and it is the only organization that has the power to represent the interests of the undergraduate student body.
