The voters have spoken, the omnipresent television cameras, the polls, the predictions and the newswomen have departed for warmer pastures of hot weather, summer and sandals; the truth, the New Hampshire primary, as is the case with so many primaries, was not won in the polling booths, but remains to be woven in the columns of newspaper yet to be produced about it.

For the results, those who are interested, may be found in the Republican primary: Nixon, 69%; McGovern, 62%; Anderson, 26%; Rockefeller, 16%, and a number of write-in candidates. (The Democratic primary: Muskie, 75.5%; McGovern, 60.6%; others, 5.9%.)

The results, however, reach well beyond the confines of the New Hampshire primary. Nixon has won a substantial victory, but McGovern has not been reduced to the role of an also-ran; he is a candidate for the nomination, and will be highly effective on the campaign trail.

The New Hampshire results were of surpassing interest for a number of reasons: to Mr. McGovern, who had been suffering from the handicap of losing the Iowa vote; to Mr. Nixon, who was cut off by a series of write-in votes; to the other candidates, particularly Mr. Rockefeller, who has been the main beneficiary of the write-ins. The results also indicate a growing interest in Mr. Muskie, who has scored a surprising victory.
