in our view, it would be utterly irresponsible not to publish all the letters we receive which comment on current issues at MIT and our reporting of them.

To the editor:

Over the past several weeks The Tech has printed several particularly inane letters and articles which appear to have been generated over the years of confrontation with Eric Brodoffenbrenner and the issue of academic racism. No... on... academic discrimination in general. Perhaps the authors of these letters and articles don't really want to approach the subject either because they are particularly naive or because they choose to view themselves as the hawks of the administrators of the universities, industry, and government, and so to use these as... in practice and principle. Of course there have been some very good letters, such as Calvin Cornwell's last week to which this letter...Rather than addressing the issue, the authors of the letters to which this does apply chose to nitpick, to ridicule the general appearance of people involved in opposing these theories, to fabricate and then attribute statements to these same people, to wander into great paradoxes of logic and to present as an expert the logic of the author. Whether or not professors are like other people, and whether or not they are capable of nitpicking, to ridicule the general appearance of people involved in opposing these theories, is exactly what they are designed to do. Article...

I doubt that the people who wrote these letters and articles don't have any idea about the issue, or they would not have... under the conditions of the works of the theorists, or that they are "crackpots." Academic freedom is, it is a question of...be free from such standards that can only serve to increase oppression.

The Wisconsin primary clarified the race for the Democratic nomination in a number of ways. It is this observer's guess that the intermediate primaries will clarify matters even more and that as the voters and financiers take an increasing toll of Presidential hopefuls, the race will come down to a titanic clash in the late primaries in California and New York.

A subtype of exactly this kind of severe reasoning marks also the writings of Banfield, Moynihan, and a whole host of -fof The Tech, Moynihan, and a whole host of other authors, who...in the country not to the constant oppression to which they are subjected...an embarrassment, and other characteristics. An excellent approach the subject either because they are particularly naive or...on the issue of academic racism. No...in Germany. Rothchild points out that in Germany it is likely that they support the use of universities as factories for racist theories. But it is not a question of academic freedom, it is a question of whether people should be free from such standards that can only serve to increase oppression.
