N.E. sailing season ends

MIT's men's and women's sailing teams ended their successful New England Intercolligate competition this past weekend, as the men sailed in the New England Intercolligate Single-handed Championships at the Coast Guard Academy and the women competed in the Sloop Sow Trophy at Radcliffe.

Team's two entries in the men's single-handed, Alan E. P. '72 and Steve Cacchio '74, both qualified in the semi-final round on Saturday and advanced to Sunday's finals.

Heavy winds on Sunday made the going rough for the two relatively lightweight skippers and made the Academy's sailing routine useless. Cacchio turned in a fourth place finish, and Spoon placed tenth. The series was won by Al Hughes '74 of Coast Guard, and the top two finishers will qualify for the national finals to be sailed in California next month.

In the Sloop Sow Trophy, sailed at Radcliffe on Saturday and Sunday, the MIT women tied with the host team on points, but were awarded second place in the tie-breaking process.

Maria Bazzitta '73 and Shelley Bernstein '74, co-skippering in A-Division, took low point divisional bonus with fifteen points in seven races. Jackson, Boston University, and Newton followed MIT to round out the four-school fleet. The women's varsity team will compete in the Women's National Intercolligate Championships, scheduled to be sailed in Philadelphia on June 10 and 11.

A Psychohistorical Inquiry
BRUCE MAZUZ
Professor of History at M.I.T.

In this important book, Professor Mazuz attempts to uncover the "real" Nixon nobody knows. "He traces the man's fundamental psychological patterns chronologically through his wartime Whittier Naval Academy, the self-named "Silent Crisis" and the rehabilitating reversals of his New Economic Policy of 1971 and his announcement of his Peking trip. These reversals he sees wholly inconsistent with Nixon's lifelong delight in "creating-crisis" that challenges him and builds up his much-needed strong self-image. Basically Mazuz sees Nixon as a man of peace contrictorily driven to unacknowledged agression in his compulsive determination to escape through "grandeur," the failure that overcomes his father."
