Space shortage hits MIT student activities
By Rob Hunter

Examination of student activities is currently placing several major organizations in a difficult position. While the Institute’s living quarters are usually considered quite comfortable, the primary housing for student activities, is already overcrowded, and other space available for student activities is subject prior leases of other tenants.

The groups who are actively looking for additional space are the Student Art Association (SAA), the MIT Science Fiction Society (MTSSFS), and, most importantly, the Music Department. The Art Association, which contains the Student Affairs office, has space limitations in its membership according to John Buttrick, head of the department, enrollment in the department has also increased in its membership as a result of the opening of the new room for practice purposes. The primary housing for student activities is already overcrowded, and other space available for student activities is subject prior leases of other tenants.

The groups who are actively looking for additional space are the Student Art Association (SAA), the MIT Science Fiction Society (MTSSFS), and, most importantly, the Music Department. The Art Association, which contains the Student Affairs office, has space limitations in its membership according to John Buttrick, head of the department, enrollment in the department has also increased in its membership as a result of the opening of the new room for practice purposes. The primary housing for student activities is already overcrowded, and other space available for student activities is subject prior leases of other tenants.

The groups who are actively looking for additional space are the Student Art Association (SAA), the MIT Science Fiction Society (MTSSFS), and, most importantly, the Music Department. The Art Association, which contains the Student Affairs office, has space limitations in its membership according to John Buttrick, head of the department, enrollment in the department has also increased in its membership as a result of the opening of the new room for practice purposes. The primary housing for student activities is already overcrowded, and other space available for student activities is subject prior leases of other tenants.

The groups who are actively looking for additional space are the Student Art Association (SAA), the MIT Science Fiction Society (MTSSFS), and, most importantly, the Music Department. The Art Association, which contains the Student Affairs office, has space limitations in its membership according to John Buttrick, head of the department, enrollment in the department has also increased in its membership as a result of the opening of the new room for practice purposes. The primary housing for student activities is already overcrowded, and other space available for student activities is subject prior leases of other tenants.

The groups who are actively looking for additional space are the Student Art Association (SAA), the MIT Science Fiction Society (MTSSFS), and, most importantly, the Music Department. The Art Association, which contains the Student Affairs office, has space limitations in its membership according to John Buttrick, head of the department, enrollment in the department has also increased in its membership as a result of the opening of the new room for practice purposes. The primary housing for student activities is already overcrowded, and other space available for student activities is subject prior leases of other tenants.