The mood in the streets on Tuesday was almost that of business as usual, if it weren’t for the McGovern volunteers on the street corners, urging people that “It’s your turn to decide in favor of McGovern.” But it was. The votes had been cast in a record low percentage of eligible voters, and it was time to wait out the returns and the endless predictions made by the television networks.

New York was considered the key state in the McGovern effort, with its highly Democratic electorate, a Tuesday night, McGovern volunteers, who had put thousands of hours of work throughout the primary and charted their progress at the Hilton Hotel for the return of the atmosphere was rather strange, considering the circumstances. There was red, white, and blue silk bunting, a band blaring rock music, and the "The speech was very moving, and although some tears were shed, McGovern had again encouraged his volunteers in the best speeches he had delivered throughout the entire campaign.

The Republicans were allowed but a short celebration, since along with Nixon’s victory, the Democrats had picked up seats in the Senate and had retained control of the House, and the net effect was that next day, there was nothing new or unexpected. However, the McGovern candidacy will not be forgotten for quite some time. It came at a time when the Democratic party was just struggling to get back on its feet, and it was only a slight down turn to defeat landslide proportions, his candidacy, his issue of ending war and the last two weeks seemed destined to prove the agony. However, the mood changed as television action to make his concession speech.

He brought the campaign into focus stating that they had a moral victory, namely his candidacy and reorganization at the Convention. He further stated that his candidacy had put pressure on the Nixon administration to put an end to the war, and he would continue his fight for peace in the Senate.

Possibly the largest student research project ever undertaken at MIT is presently being orga-nized under the auspices of the Department of Political Science, and will deal with reforms recently adopted by the Democratic Party.

Professor Kenneth Hoffman, head of the Mathematics Department and former chairman of the McGovern Committee on MIT Education, cites the advantage in setting up a figures that give MIT, and stresses, that “Many faculty feel that talents are the personal business of the individuals concerned. The most important information personal nature,” says Hoffman, who acknowledges that under the present system of salary inequality in salary can be’ created if the person has a financial dissatisfied leave. Gray estimates that this year only about 8% of the MIT faculty are new-comers, and many of these numbers are being newly created positions. The motivation to remain in an academic environment, both Gray and Hoffman note, is more personal than financial, since most professors could receive greater salaries working for government or industry. Gray feels that the sometimes-suggested proposition that all faculty in a particular professorate rank receive the same salary is “not tenable,” and it is certain that MIT’s past and current policy of keeping individual and average departmental salary figures secret will be the policy of the future. Students, he urges, who wish to compare average MIT salaries with those of other institutions should consult the AABP bulletin.

Possibly the largest student research project ever undertaken at MIT is presently being organized under the auspices of the Department of Political Science, and will deal with reforms recently adopted by the Democratic Party.

Professor Kenneth Hoffman, head of the Mathematics Department and former chairman of the McGovern Committee on MIT Education, cites the advantage in setting up a figures that give MIT, and stresses, that “Many faculty feel that talents are the personal business of the individuals concerned. The most important information personal nature,” says Hoffman, who acknowledges that under the present system of salary inequality in salary can be’ created if the person has a financial dissatisfied leave. Gray estimates that this year only about 8% of the MIT faculty are new-comers, and many of these numbers are being newly created positions. The motivation to remain in an academic environment, both Gray and Hoffman note, is more personal than financial, since most professors could receive greater salaries working for government or industry. Gray feels that the sometimes-suggested proposition that all faculty in a particular professorate rank receive the same salary is “not tenable,” and it is certain that MIT’s past and current policy of keeping individual and average departmental salary figures secret will be the policy of the future. Students, he urges, who wish to compare average MIT salaries with those of other institutions should consult the AABP bulletin.

The project, tentatively referred to as “The American Delegate,” will be a study of the effectiveness of interviewing techniques on a series of questions, including extent of activity at the Convention, extent to which the person has been active in the local Democratic organization since the campaign.

In addition to the core group of six students, as many as one hundred other undergraduates, who are all going home over Christmas vacation or spring vacation or have been active in the campaign, and extent to which the person has been active in the local Democratic organization since the campaign.

In addition to the core group of six students, as many as one hundred other undergraduates, who are all going home over Christmas vacation or spring vacation or have been active in the campaign, and extent to which the person has been active in the local Democratic organization since the campaign.

In addition to the core group of six students, as many as one hundred other undergraduates, who are all going home over Christmas vacation or spring vacation or have been active in the campaign, and extent to which the person has been active in the local Democratic organization since the campaign.

In addition to the core group of six students, as many as one hundred other undergraduates, who are all going home over Christmas vacation or spring vacation or have been active in the campaign, and extent to which the person has been active in the local Democratic organization since the campaign.

In addition to the core group of six students, as many as one hundred other undergraduates, who are all going home over Christmas vacation or spring vacation or have been active in the campaign, and extent to which the person has been active in the local Democratic organization since the campaign.