Students protest slayings

By Walter T. Middelbrook

Angered by the recent killings, a group gathered at Kresge Auditorium last night to discuss the slayings of black students at Southern University.

The Baton Rouge campus was the climax in the Boston area of a nationwide day-long protest and morale-building event in the wake of the deaths of Phyllis A. Smith of New Orleans, Louisiana, and Leonard Brown of Gulfport, Mississippi.

The most recent killings were those of two black students as Southern University. The massacre was seen as one of the most tragic aspects of the ongoing student uprising in the state of Louisiana.

The students were calling for the immediate resignation of the university president, who was accused of covering up the previous slayings of black students.

They also expressed their support for the striking students at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign, who have been demanding an end to police violence and racial discrimination.

Vanocur talks over problems of campaign

Vanocur began by reading a speech he had written for delivery at Yale on a future date, and a free-wheeling question-and-answer session followed. According to Vanocur, "the trouble McGovern had was, he got his message across." His problem was that "people chose to keep what they had rather than jump into the unknown."

In addition to several political science professors who were present, the small conference room was filled with spectators, filling every available corner.

Vanocur began a reading a speech he had written for delivery at Yale on a future date, and a free-wheeling question-and-answer session followed. According to Vanocur, "the trouble McGovern had was, he got his message across." His problem was that "people chose to keep what they had rather than jump into the unknown."

By Bert Holsted

Sandor Vanocur, formerly of NBC's "four horsemen" political convention floor reporters, analyzed the 1972 presidential election in a wide-ranging discussion Thursday with members of the political science faculty.

Graphic Arts plans for 3-2-1 copying

By Robert Efron

The cost of Xerox copying to the MIT community will be reduced with the addition of Graphic Arts to the MIT copy service.

The new rates, effective December 4, will be three cents for the first two copies of 11-20 copies and one cent for 21-100 copies. The old rates of one cent were more expensive.

The new rates are aimed primarily at students who need a small number of copies in a hurry. By lowering the unit costs to departments, the Institute hopes to encourage more copying as a service to the MIT community.