The question of whether to continue Freshman Pass-Fail indefinitely is raised once more as a meeting, after being postponed from February 1, is held last week. The committee, which covered last year's debate for The Tech, will judge in the surrounding pass-fail in the freshman year in a series of meetings.

(The question of whether to continue Freshman Pass-Fail indefinitely is raised once more. Last year's debate for the Tech, which covered last year's debate, will judge the surrounding pass-fail in the freshman year in a series of meetings.)

According to Professor of Mathematics Arthur Mattuck, chairman of the Freshman Pass-Fail Grading Committee, the original charge to the committee, which he summarized as "trying to find out how the hidden grades are working," was to consider trying to make changes. The committee, he said, will "take a quick look at pass-fail again." It will have to be quick, because the committee was not appointed by the Faculty. Chairman Hartley Rogers until last Wednesday to report to the Faculty in March. Voting on the question is currently none of the committee members. According to Faculty rule, since the committee members have not established their procedures, the rules must "slide" over for one month. Mattuck said the work of the committee has been limited to the task of conducting a comprehensive questionnaire on pass-fail has been sent out to all freshmen, 400 freshmen and 250 juniors. In addition, individuals and groups on the committee have polled various departments about their handling of grading as well as grading with particular concern for the matter of so-called hidden grades.

When asked what the main issues before the committee were, Mattuck replied that he thought of the medical school request for more information about hidden grades, but, as he noted, which was the main reason he was appointed chairman. "Other people might want the same information," he added. Last year the Faculty cited the "need for more information about hidden grades."
