Men in McCormick: Unwelcome guests?

(Continued from page 11)

At the meeting Housemaster Steve Senturia explained that the letter from Eisenberg contained a veiled threat. "There are two sides of every coin that on the books at MIT. There is a legal limit to the number that can reside in McCormick. There is also another role which allows visitors. The Dean's office is embarrassed by this contradiction. This flexibility could be like it if all the guys at McCormick would suddenly vanish."

Holly Beine, a senior tutor, then spoke up. "Guys must realize that they must restrict their guests. The regular residents should not have to fight for working space or bathrooms. The newer and younger residents for working space or bathrooms."

There is no major decision was made at the meeting, such as a raid to count the men now in McCormick, or make their hostesses pay rent. But, as Senturia said, "It's great if we can make permanent male guests were put more on the defensive." And girls object could be tied to making protection of their rights first, before those of nonstudents, including the right to have one that particularly offends them removed, if necessary.

There was no major decision made at the meeting, such as a raid to count the men now in McCormick, or make their hostesses pay rent. But, as Senturia said, "It's great if we can make permanent male guests were put more on the defensive." And girls object could be tied to making protection of their rights first, before those of nonstudents, including the right to have one that particularly offends them removed, if necessary.