Crew in Wisconsin: wins one out of two

By David I. Katz

The MIT Heavyweight crew went down to defeat again this past weekend, this time at the hands of the University of Wisconsin and Dartmouth. The varsity rowing for the Cockayne Cup in Madison, rowed against both Dartmouth and U. Wisconsin.

There were two starts for the varsity race, as the seven-man in the Wisconsin boat broke his foot-stretcher 15 strokes into the race. After a 20 minute wait for repairs, the race was re-started. Again, the Tech boat jumped the two others on the start, but the Badger crew came back and kept rowing. With both boats stroking at 33%, the Engineers could hold off Wisconsin until the 1000 meter mark where they held a length lead. At this point, the race turned into a contest for second place.

Dartmouth, rowing at a 32½ cadence for most of the race, brought their stroke up to a 37 with about 500 meters left, MIT, executing their boat sprint of the season, upped their cadence to 41. This allowed them to hold off the Dartmouth crew by almost three seconds. Coach Peter Holled, looking back at that loss, said that "this was our best race of the year," and that we were beaten by "a bigger and faster crew."

Later that day in Hanover, the freshman crews of Dartmouth and MIT raced. In the second race, MIT had a length lead after the first 500 meters, but never lowered the cadence from 37° where they started. With 500 meters left in the race and with Dartmouth moving, MIT could just not keep up and lost by six seconds.

The first boat was even more discouraging. They had a half-length at the 500 meter mark and a whole length with 700 meters to go in the race. At this point, the Tech coxswain started the sprint. When the Engineer boat did not move away from the Dartmouth boat, our cox realized that that would be the best time to try and move. He was right, Dartmouth caught the MIT boat at the finish to win by 1½' of a second.
