Campus liquor to be sold

Now that a legislative block has been lifted, the liquor issue is soon to apply for a Beer and Wine Dispensing License for Lobdell and Twelfth Street. Previous drop-off calls for beer disposal at Lobdell, with beer on tap at Twenty-Seven Inn.

The legislative block was recently passed by the Massachusetts General Court and signed by Governor Francis Sargent '39. When the ban was overturned on March 1, it was done by changing the language in the bill, and not through the section of the General Laws of the Commonwealth, to remove a minor. Unfortunately, no one noticed that the time that offers part of the law was courted in terms of people age 21.

The new law eliminated the disparity which existed, among other places, in the section which described special licenses for educational institutions.

Iowa State University, for example, received its license in September. Professor Victor Weisskopf, head of the Institute for Advanced Study, had to publish a glowing tribute in order to obtain it.

But it went on to ask that there be no "regularly scheduled events" during the final faculty meeting.

The motion was passed, according to the rules of the motion, as a "very personal decision." I suspect that sort of thing would not take place in a university faculty meeting.
