New housing a Watergate heroes?

By Michael McNamara

Last week, MIT announced another attempt to solve the difficult question: What sort of student housing is most desirable? A number of students and others on campus are asking the same question. The current situation is not to everybody's taste. In recent years, the dormitories have become increasingly crowded, and the quality of life in them has declined. The dorms are not well maintained, and the food is often substandard. Some students feel that they are being treated unfairly, and that their rights are not being respected.

The dorms are also a source of frustration for the administration. They have to deal with a large number of complaints each year, and they are often unable to resolve them satisfactorily. This is partly because the dorms are not entirely under the control of the administration. They are also influenced by the students who live in them, and by the fraternities and sororities that are housed in them.

The administration is aware of the problems, and is trying to do something about them. They have already announced some changes, and they are planning to make more changes in the future. The goal is to create a more pleasant and comfortable environment for the students.

The dorms are also a source of controversy for the student body. Some students feel that they are being mistreated, and that they are not being given a fair hearing. Others feel that they are being overprotected, and that they are not being given enough freedom.

The dorms are also a source of controversy for the administration. They have to balance the needs of the students with the needs of the university. They have to make sure that the dorms are a safe and comfortable place to live, but they also have to make sure that the students are not being overprotected.

The dorms are also a source of controversy for the fraternities and sororities. They are often accused of being exclusive and elitist, and of not being open to everyone. The administration is aware of these problems, and is trying to do something about them. They have already announced some changes, and they are planning to make more changes in the future.

The dorms are also a source of controversy for the students who live in them. They are often accused of being lazy and undisciplined, and of not being responsible.
