By Mike McNamara

The Tech has learned that the Associate Heads of the Electrical Engineering Department, Professor Mildred S. Dresselhaus and Professors Robert R. Fano, are being considered as the most likely candidates to replace Professor Louis D. Ciferri in the interest that Stratfield steeps down next June (The Tech, 9/25).

Outside the MIT community, and one-sixth are from members, and one-sixth are from students, one-sixth are faculty. Prof. SR (Division of Sponsored Research) kept showing that one-half of the remaining ten are members of the men’s groups; twenty are women.

By Wendy Peikes

Women’s Forum last Monday.

Before her appointment at MIT, Rowe was employed as a consultant to the Department of Education in February.

Other statistics Rowe has included much of her efforts in the MIT, Rowe was employed as a consultant to the Department of Education in February.

Rowe seemed up her accomplishments at the Institute by presenting an explanation of her work and its impact on the campus. On the average, in one week she had 10-15 appointments, write one article and one book review, and read one program.

Rowe stated that out of the 35 groups and individuals that she had been in contact with since coming to MIT, she had been able to assist with their needs as they requested.

Other statistics Rowe has told that one-half of the women she has seen are in the Computer Science department. She has been able to assist with the inclusion of the national system of Massachusetts in the national system.

By Barb Moore

Mercer presented award for work in food industry.

By Paul Schindler

The MIT Campus Patrol, now a co-ordinated operation serving as a co-ordinated organization, is a campus security force, not a home for natural police officers, according to its chief, Janice Olivieri.

Both of these aspects, and several others, make it extra-special organization.

The presence of a woman on the force is exemplary too, according to Affirmative Action terms. Harvard, for example, has no women.

It wasn’t a trivial matter to introduce the first woman to the force; the height requirement had to be waived. But according to Olivieri, Maureen Twooney is only 5 feet 3 inches.

Since most women do not meet the Patrol’s standards, Olivieri said, “we cannot put women into the military services.” This means that she will be cut off from the usual standards of personal experience, and will have to rely on a search. That doesn’t make a good patrol person.

Olivieri was named the first woman on the Patrol since it was founded in 1957, at a time when the sex outbreaks during the disturbances of the late 60’s. MIT was already there.

“We’d rather have them come around,” Olivieri said. “We’d rather have them come around,” Olivieri said. “The committee is not involved yet,” Fano pointed out, “and if they are considering me, then I’m the last one to know about it.”

Hubert Melo was presented the Underwood-Prescott Memorial Award at a luncheon at the MIT faculty club last Tuesday.

Melo, who is president of the National Canners Association, was chosen to receive this award for his work in food production and abundance.

After the luncheon, a symposium was held in Kendall Auditorium to discuss “Ecology, the Environment and the Food Industry New Horizons and Hazards in Resource Management.”

Other members of the panel were Mr. Evan Binkerd, vice president of Armour Food Company; Dr. Robert J. Ditmer, of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, and Dr. Robert Timmins, President of Arbor, Incorporated.

Campus Patrol becomes co-ed.

There were major confrontations over minor incidents at that time, how he described the situation. "MIT had two patrols and one cruiser. We have a long way since then."

The Patrol, in Olivieri’s view, meets the special needs for personal understanding in the university community. Yet they have always carried guns, because of the ever-present potential for violence in any urban situation. Thus, while many campuses had to make the only more of armed patronage.

Howard W. Davis, general manager of the Harvard Co-op, announced earlier this week that members of the Co-op will receive a 5% rebate on purchases made in Fiscal 1972. According to a letter in Harvard Crimson, Davis attributed the one percent decrease in last year’s rebate to higher sales and less shopping. Rebate checks will be distributed starting October 9.

Campus Patrol requires every incoming patrol person to sign a statement establishing use law rules.

The rules are more stringent than those applying to any city or state officer, including a prohibition against social drinking.

Patrol officers are full- fledged law enforcement officers, with the power of arrest, with the right to issue citations for offenses committed in their area of jurisdiction, which is MIT property. They can also make "fresh pursuit" into neighboring localities and arrest someone who is suspected of committing a crime at MIT.

FBI Co-operation.

There is a system of mutual cooperation between the Campus Patrol and other police agencies, as well as the FBI, but it is not as mushful as critics have suggested.

In terms of informa- tion, "We don’t tell them what they could get by walking into the information office. Nothing else. All we are doing is saying them a trip over."

Another letter was addressed to FBI agents who arrested an MIT student last year on a draft charge, he said that the Patrol is "legally bound to protect their rights by a legal warrant, "We can not have them check in with us, so we know what is going on, then have them sent out on the basis of that information."

He noted that outside police agencies are often given copies of MIT student papers, and mentioned recent data from the F.B.I. To a Police to a Thursday story about (Please turn to page 2).