Dining -

The Tooth in the Pudding

By Storm Kauffman

DINING - Service

The assumption by the Institute of managerial control of dining operations on the February 11th issue of The Tech is

The major reorganization which will necessarily follow, however, is on the many inadequacies of the system.

The complaints are many. Students grumble about prices and limited selections, rising prices, and poor service from those who should know better (the Dining Service officials who serve behind the counter). Dining Service officials point to increased financial difficulties as a situation requiring some sort of restructuring of the system.

As the decision to dump Stouffer's comes on the heels of the completion of the consulting study undertaken by Dana and Associates, the concern is valid, but the Dining Service officials stress, did not call for a change in management, I would hope that the move is being made with an eye to solving these problems. At the time the study was announced, many people were apprehensive about Dining Service, fearing that a move from a centralized service (especially from their fellow students) to one by which all the complaints about inedible or unsavory food, the small number of people on campus, and some recommendations on the dining operations' management doesn't blow their chance to work

That is the change-over is an ideal time to in 1974 is a golden opportunity.

The change-over is an ideal time to assure food quality were the motivations. The change-over is an ideal time to assure food quality were the motivations.

By Storm Kauffman

DINING - Service

The assumption by the Institute of managerial control of dining operations on the February 11th issue of The Tech is valid, however, is on the many inadequacies of the system.

The complaints are many. Students grumble about prices and limited selections, rising prices, and poor service from those who should know better (the Dining Service officials who serve behind the counter). Dining Service officials point to increased financial difficulties as a situation requiring some sort of restructuring of the system.

As the decision to dump Stouffer's comes on the heels of the completion of the consulting study undertaken by Dana and Associates, the concern is valid, but the Dining Service officials stress, did not call for a change in management, I would hope that the move is being made with an eye to solving these problems. At the time the study was announced, many people were apprehensive about Dining Service, fearing that a move from a centralized service (especially from their fellow students) to one by which all the complaints about inedible or unsavory food, the small number of people on campus, and some recommendations on the dining operations' management doesn't blow their chance to work

That is the change-over is an ideal time to assure food quality were the motivations. The change-over is an ideal time to assure food quality were the motivations.

By Storm Kauffman

DINING - Service

The assumption by the Institute of managerial control of dining operations on the February 11th issue of The Tech is valid, however, is on the many inadequacies of the system.

The complaints are many. Students grumble about prices and limited selections, rising prices, and poor service from those who should know better (the Dining Service officials who serve behind the counter). Dining Service officials point to increased financial difficulties as a situation requiring some sort of restructuring of the system.

As the decision to dump Stouffer's comes on the heels of the completion of the consulting study undertaken by Dana and Associates, the concern is valid, but the Dining Service officials stress, did not call for a change in management, I would hope that the move is being made with an eye to solving these problems. At the time the study was announced, many people were apprehensive about Dining Service, fearing that a move from a centralized service (especially from their fellow students) to one by which all the complaints about inedible or unsavory food, the small number of people on campus, and some recommendations on the dining operations' management doesn't blow their chance to work

That is the change-over is an ideal time to assure food quality were the motivations. The change-over is an ideal time to assure food quality were the motivations.

By Storm Kauffman

DINING - Service

The assumption by the Institute of managerial control of dining operations on the February 11th issue of The Tech is valid, however, is on the many inadequacies of the system.

The complaints are many. Students grumble about prices and limited selections, rising prices, and poor service from those who should know better (the Dining Service officials who serve behind the counter). Dining Service officials point to increased financial difficulties as a situation requiring some sort of restructuring of the system.

As the decision to dump Stouffer's comes on the heels of the completion of the consulting study undertaken by Dana and Associates, the concern is valid, but the Dining Service officials stress, did not call for a change in management, I would hope that the move is being made with an eye to solving these problems. At the time the study was announced, many people were apprehensive about Dining Service, fearing that a move from a centralized service (especially from their fellow students) to one by which all the complaints about inedible or unsavory food, the small number of people on campus, and some recommendations on the dining operations' management doesn't blow their chance to work

That is the change-over is an ideal time to assure food quality were the motivations. The change-over is an ideal time to assure food quality were the motivations.

By Storm Kauffman

DINING - Service

The assumption by the Institute of managerial control of dining operations on the February 11th issue of The Tech is valid, however, is on the many inadequacies of the system.

The complaints are many. Students grumble about prices and limited selections, rising prices, and poor service from those who should know better (the Dining Service officials who serve behind the counter). Dining Service officials point to increased financial difficulties as a situation requiring some sort of restructuring of the system.

As the decision to dump Stouffer's comes on the heels of the completion of the consulting study undertaken by Dana and Associates, the concern is valid, but the Dining Service officials stress, did not call for a change in management, I would hope that the move is being made with an eye to solving these problems. At the time the study was announced, many people were apprehensive about Dining Service, fearing that a move from a centralized service (especially from their fellow students) to one by which all the complaints about inedible or unsavory food, the small number of people on campus, and some recommendations on the dining operations' management doesn't blow their chance to work

That is the change-over is an ideal time to assure food quality were the motivations. The change-over is an ideal time to assure food quality were the motivations.

By Storm Kauffman

DINING - Service

The assumption by the Institute of managerial control of dining operations on the February 11th issue of The Tech is valid, however, is on the many inadequacies of the system.

The complaints are many. Students grumble about prices and limited selections, rising prices, and poor service from those who should know better (the Dining Service officials who serve behind the counter). Dining Service officials point to increased financial difficulties as a situation requiring some sort of restructuring of the system.

As the decision to dump Stouffer's comes on the heels of the completion of the consulting study undertaken by Dana and Associates, the concern is valid, but the Dining Service officials stress, did not call for a change in management, I would hope that the move is being made with an eye to solving these problems. At the time the study was announced, many people were apprehensive about Dining Service, fearing that a move from a centralized service (especially from their fellow students) to one by which all the complaints about inedible or unsavory food, the small number of people on campus, and some recommendations on the dining operations' management doesn't blow their chance to work

That is the change-over is an ideal time to assure food quality were the motivations. The change-over is an ideal time to assure food quality were the motivations.