The association has turned toward the practical use of the "super 8." Four of the systems have been sold to educational television stations, who use them to "do what they would do anyway cheaper." Some of his students' works have been aired, and although "it has usually been at 2:00am," the stations have been generally cooperative.

Leacock is interested in finding people who want to use film in relation to their outside knowledge, "rather than training an army of technicians." At MIT, Leacock has been successful with his goal. He actually has people involved in the technical end who are making films themselves.

"Actually, I'm sort of sick of super 8." Leacock commented. "Your same lens gets associated with a particular thing, and there is a tendency to get stuck in it. Someone calls you in the middle of the night - it doesn't work." After super 8, Leacock isn't sure what he will do. He is sure that it will be "something much more imaginative."
