Tech survey shows that new requirement is liked do get something out of them, even though they're not the greatest courses in the world."

Naming humanities alternatives in psychology, economics and management, one student said, "If those options weren't open, the whole requirement would be a bust." Others echoed the view that humanities should "prepare you for the outside world" with background in such disciplines as writing and political science. One freshman suggested, "They should require writing courses as something that would be definitely helpful.
So it's shaly to require just eight courses of humanities."

Despite the strong feelings about the role of humanities at M.I.T which permeated the sample, students were rather uninformed about the recent changes in the requirement. Only half claimed to be familiar with the substance of the revision. All of those who felt they could make a judgement said they thought the change made in March was an improvement over the system that had been in effect since 1949.
