Talks stalled in SEIU strike

Other members of the staff have been picketing, some with the strikers and others in a separate picket line at the MIT main gate, but have received several expressions of sympathy for their actions, according to Professor of Mathematics Warren Ambrose.

"Most of the secretaries and staff people who come down to pick up mail wouldn't dare defy their supervisors by refusing to get the mail," Ambrose said. "But many of them have said that they support us for picketing them."

Wynne told The Tech that no meetings have been held with union and MIT officials since last Thursday, when a meeting was scheduled with federal mediator Daniel F. Hurley. At that meeting, Wynne said, "it was clear that we were so far apart that there was no point to the meeting."

The union requested a 10 per cent pay hike in each of the next two years, as opposed to the 7½ per cent MIT had offered at that meeting. MIT officials stated, however, that they were going to stand by their position and not increase the value of the contract in any way.

Supply problems mount for Coop during strike

Picketing at MIT has been concentrated at or near the Student Center. One student, an employee of the Student Center Committee's 24-Hour Coffeehouse, has filed assault charges against a picker who the student claims hit him while the student was trying to deliver yogurt for the coffeehouse.

"Instead, many people have told me that they were getting along fine, that they had no complaints about lack of supplies at MIT. "Instead, many people have told me that they were getting along fine, that they had no complaints about lack of supplies at MIT."

Supplies of some merchandise in the MIT Coop are running low as the strike by the Service Employees International Union Local 254 makes it difficult for the Coop to get deliveries.

"Several companies have refused to come pick up lines to make deliveries at MIT, making it impossible for the Coop and other MIT organizations to get all the supplies they need."
