Students get more aid with new PCS method

(Continued from page 1) people who would have qualified in the past, Frailey says he expects the number who qualify to go up.

There is an additional complication, however. Gallagher pointed out that "the mean income of an aid applicant family will go up (because of inflation), and we don't know what that jump will be, so it is very difficult to project what the overall effect will be on the student body." But he said that "the change that CSS makes is likely to be greater than the change in average income."

Asked whether MIT might not be able to follow the CSS guidelines because of lack of funds, Frailey said that he hopes to get additional funds, but pointed out that the same inflationary pressures that caused CSS to make the change will also affect MIT's ability to spend additional money for financial aid, because of competing requests from other departments and activities.

Because of this, he said he would expect the MIT equity level — the amount of need required for students to get scholarships or grants as well as loans, for financial aid — to be increased. The equity level is now $1750.

Director of Admissions Peter H. Richardson '48 told The Tech "we anticipate no change in our selection process," but says that the increase in financial aid could affect the number of students who are offered admission.

To MIT — who accept — the "yield." Last year this number was about 24 per cent, he says. "Each year we find that there are four or five universities that get a larger fraction of those students offered admission," he says. Since those schools may not follow the CSS guidelines, Richardson said he was left with "become more attractive to prospective students."

Richardson added that he will not know the actual effect on admissions until June of next year, after the deadline for replies from students offered admission.
