And they're off... or are they?

By Peter Fenchley

Kennedy and Mondale are out, Uddal is in, and Jackson is lining his truck shoes. A sports fan, he'll aim for the all-American 1976 Presidential sweep-scrolling through the names of 10 players that have held the banner of America's chief executive.

For the annual Princeton Review, a group of journalists cross the country picking up on the emerging trends in America's political climate. In a few days they're back in Washington with a list of 10 candidates that have the most potential to win the White House.

As the group arrives, it becomes clear that the presidential race is heating up. The candidates are vying for the same battleground states, and the media is covering every move. The Princeton Review's list is not the only one to come out this week, but it's certainly one of the most anticipated.

One of the journalists on the Princeton Review list is... (name redacted)

The journalist is a seasoned reporter, known for his sharp analysis and incisive interviews. He covers a range of topics, from politics to culture, but his focus on the presidential race is particularly keen.

What makes the Princeton Review's list so significant is that it's not just based on speculation or guesswork. The journalists behind the list have spent months researching and interviewing candidates, and they've distilled their findings into a concise, meaningful list.

So what's next for the Princeton Review? They'll continue to follow the candidates closely, updating their list as new information emerges. And for the journalists, the race is only just beginning. They'll be on the ground, reporting live from the campaign trail, bringing readers the latest news and analysis.

But what about the candidates themselves? They're already hard at work, developing strategies and messages to try to win over voters. The race is shaping up to be a fierce contest, with each candidate vying for the lead.

For now, the Princeton Review's list is just a snapshot of the current political climate. But as the campaign season rolls on, it's sure to provide even more insight into what's to come.