No one seems concerned at all

By Michael McNamara

The MIT administration is having trouble convincing some people that the budgetary situation of the Institute is as difficult as it actually is. They can't convince the alumni who are expected to contribute more than $30 worth of things. The class size decision is an example - even a last ditch effort to convince administrators that it might be wise to house students before admitting them, even if it means foregoing one year's income from a larger class?

How do students convince administrators that it is not wise to throw away the life they've built in order to save money which he doesn't want at all? How does he convince the administration that he doesn't want to leave MIT for another reason? At least two campus newspapers and some of the alumni who are expected to contribute more than $30 worth of things. The class size decision is an example - even a last ditch effort to convince administrators that it might be wise to house students before admitting them, even if it means foregoing one year's income from a larger class?

How do students convince administrators that it is not wise to throw away the life they've built in order to save money which he doesn't want at all? How does he convince the administration that he doesn't want to leave MIT for another reason? At least two campus newspapers and some of the alumni who are expected to contribute more than $30 worth of things. The class size decision is an example - even a last ditch effort to convince administrators that it might be wise to house students before admitting them, even if it means foregoing one year's income from a larger class?

How do students convince administrators that it is not wise to throw away the life they've built in order to save money which he doesn't want at all? How does he convince the administration that he doesn't want to leave MIT for another reason? At least two campus newspapers and some of the alumni who are expected to contribute more than $30 worth of things. The class size decision is an example - even a last ditch effort to convince administrators that it might be wise to house students before admitting them, even if it means foregoing one year's income from a larger class?

How do students convince administrators that it is not wise to throw away the life they've built in order to save money which he doesn't want at all? How does he convince the administration that he doesn't want to leave MIT for another reason? At least two campus newspapers and some of the alumni who are expected to contribute more than $30 worth of things. The class size decision is an example - even a last ditch effort to convince administrators that it might be wise to house students before admitting them, even if it means foregoing one year's income from a larger class?

How do students convince administrators that it is not wise to throw away the life they've built in order to save money which he doesn't want at all? How does he convince the administration that he doesn't want to leave MIT for another reason? At least two campus newspapers and some of the alumni who are expected to contribute more than $30 worth of things. The class size decision is an example - even a last ditch effort to convince administrators that it might be wise to house students before admitting them, even if it means foregoing one year's income from a larger class?

How do students convince administrators that it is not wise to throw away the life they've built in order to save money which he doesn't want at all? How does he convince the administration that he doesn't want to leave MIT for another reason? At least two campus newspapers and some of the alumni who are expected to contribute more than $30 worth of things. The class size decision is an example - even a last ditch effort to convince administrators that it might be wise to house students before admitting them, even if it means foregoing one year's income from a larger class?

How do students convince administrators that it is not wise to throw away the life they've built in order to save money which he doesn't want at all? How does he convince the administration that he doesn't want to leave MIT for another reason? At least two campus newspapers and some of the alumni who are expected to contribute more than $30 worth of things. The class size decision is an example - even a last ditch effort to convince administrators that it might be wise to house students before admitting them, even if it means foregoing one year's income from a larger class?