Congress to veto NSF funding?

The measure isn’t expected to pass, given the recent opposition voiced by the Massachusetts Democrat Edward M. Kennedy, who has questioned the fact that MIT receives about 10 percent of the grants made by the NSF. This gives the organization an added edge, and that is how the proposal might “delay all future funding,” a Foundation staff member said. “The issue has generated an incredible amount of pressure on Congress, and the public has generated a great deal of pressure to cut the Foundation’s $757 million annual budget.”

“Congress is feeling very frustrated about articles on wasteful spending at a time when they are worrying quite a bit about making budgetary cuts,” one Foundation staff member said. “The issue has generated an incredible amount of pressure on Congress, and the public has generated a great deal of pressure to cut the Foundation’s $757 million annual budget.”

“The fact that MIT is the number one engineering school in the nation, must be counted in their favor,” Bruce said. “If we do pass NSF, they are very picky as they have in the past.”

Bruce did acknowledge, however, that the job market is general will not be as strong as it was last year.

“The market for engineers is shrinking,” Bruce said. “The job market for engineers is shrinking.”

Bruce also pointed to the general curriculum and technical work. “This is a big plus in favor of our graduate students,” Bruce said. “The situation is slightly different for them.”

“MIT will be in the forefront of coping with the sociotechnical needs of society, and we feel that the added assets are necessary to help MIT play that role,” Winter continued.
