Letters to the Tech

Dear Dr. Wiesner,

I experienced a rather disturbing situation last week which I feel is worthy of mention. I had the privilege of being the first to vote in the recent food exhibit, and to my utter surprise I voted for an apple.

I cannot help but feel that the American apple is suffering from a crisis of image. For too long has it been associated with a lack of sophistication and taste. However, I believe that this profile is largely due to the marketing of the apple as a simple, everyday fruit. But that is changing. I was pleased to see the apple in its new, more refined guise.

The Apple of My Eye

Sincerely,

[Signature]

Dr. Wiesner,

As a resident of this city, I was extremely dismayed at the recent food exhibit. The apple, which I had voted for, was not the type of apple I would expect to find in a food exhibit. It was, in fact, the same apple I have seen in my local supermarket.

To the Editor:

I do not understand why the apple was chosen as the exhibit. It is a fruit that has been around for centuries and has never been known for its appeal. The exhibit failed to capture the attention of the audience, and I believe it should be replaced with something more interesting.

Sincerely,

[Signature]

The apple is a fruit that has been around for centuries and has never been known for its appeal. It is a fruit that has been around for centuries and has never been known for its appeal. The exhibit failed to capture the attention of the audience, and I believe it should be replaced with something more interesting.

Sincerely,

[Signature]