MIT's role in shaping the tax bill and student meals exemption has been minimal. According to Walter Milne, Assistant to the Chairman for Urban Affairs, the Institute lobbied during the summer for the exemption measure, but has been "doing nothing" since then, and has made no move to support the BU-Mount Holyoke-Holy Cross cause.

We wrote some letters to the legislators in July, when they were considering that measure, pointing out that the 8 percent tax would be a mockery tax - not a luxury tax - on students who didn't have cooking facilities. But the legislators really weren't listening.

MIT has been charging the tax since Sept. 1, having notified the legislators really weren't listening. Walter Milne, Assistant to the Joint Committee to the Joint Committee, said, "Out I just can't see it... you're not going to see them out..." Delany said that a move to exempt student contract meals hasn't got many plans to eat today, and other people who aren't sure... but what about old people?" Politically, you have a very tough exemption to try to support the BU-Mount Holyoke-Holy Cross cause.

There has been "almost no student reaction," Beals said, leading him to 'fear' that students cared about the tax at all. "I haven't heard any complaints at all," Beals said, "but I'm not sure that students are fully aware of the tax. I'm really not sure if it's had any impact on our students on Commons at all - it's difficult to get any kind of a handle on those kinds of things."

The Institute would refund any tax money which has been collected if there should be a move by the state or by the courts to invalidate the tax, Beals said. "It all depends on how the rulings or bills are worded - whether we would have to refund all the tax, or just a part of it, or what," he explained. "It would be hard for us to keep money collected as a tax if we don't give it to the state."

The robbery should have taken 10 minutes. 4 hours later, the bank was like a circus sideshow. 8 hours later, it was the hottest thing on live TV. 12 hours later, it was all history. And it's all true.
