IAP Blood Drive meets last year's standard

By Gerald Rudack
The Technology Community Association's (TCA) IAP blood drive ended Wednesday with 324 units of blood collected, "just about where we were last year," according to Blood drive co-chairman KelHin Okumura '77.

Vacation shortage of TCA staffers prevented publicizing of the drive, and only those people who indicated at the fall drive that they wanted to be notified were contacted, Okumura said. A drive is normally held during IAP, Okumura explained, because "generally there is a critical shortage of blood after the Christmas holidays," severe enough sometimes to force postponement of elective surgery.

Although there was fear last year that MIT might lose some new students and IAP Blood Drive meets last year's standard of 1000 collected last spring. Okumura noted that in the past, up to 3000 units have been collected; however, "as far as we know, we are ahead of blood drives in other schools."

The spring blood drive will take place during the first two weeks of March.
