Spying evidence questionable

To the Editor:

Recently in The Tech, there appeared to be an article that was very disturbing. The article was titled "Spying evidence questionable." The article discusses the MIT's policy toward this pro-MIT organization and how some students feel that MIT is not doing enough to prevent spying. The article also mentions that MIT is worried about the possibility of being sued by SACC and how this could affect the upcoming election for student government.

I feel it is important to understand the context of this article and how it relates to the larger issue ofMIT's policy toward this pro-MIT organization. In the article, the author mentions that MIT is worried about the possibility of being sued by SACC and how this could affect the upcoming election for student government. The author also discusses how some students feel that MIT is not doing enough to prevent spying.

I am writing to express my concerns about this issue and to suggest some possible solutions. I believe that MIT should take stronger measures to prevent spying in order to protect the interests of all students.

Sincerely,
