Browning alumni of Century

Browning alumnus and engineer, John Browning, recently made a donation of $1 million to the school, saving the school from bankruptcy. "I believe in the school and its future," Browning said in a statement.

The school was facing financial difficulties due to a drop in enrollment and an increase in operating costs. However, with the donation, the school is now in a position to continue its educational mission.

The donation will be used to improve the school's facilities and support its programs. "We are very grateful for John's generosity," said the school's president. "His donation will make a significant difference in the lives of our students.

Browning is a very talented engineer and a true visionary," added the president. "We are honored to have him as part of our family.

The school community is invited to celebrate the donation with a Gala on Saturday, October 1st.

Browning's legacy will live on through the students he has inspired and the work he has done.

MIT dean named to HUD

MIT's dean of engineering, Jane Browning, has been named to the position of Under Secretary for Planning and Evaluation at the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD). "I am honored to have been chosen for this position," Browning said in a statement.

Browning brings a wealth of experience to the role, having served as the dean of engineering at MIT for the past 10 years. "I look forward to working with my colleagues in HUD to ensure that our nation's housing and urban policies are efficient and effective," she added.

Browning's appointment is effective immediately, and she will begin work at HUD in Washington, D.C. She will serve in this role until January 2023.
