Funds released to Exposure

funds ($700) already spent," McDermott said, adding that the Union would have had to divert other funds to pay off the debt and would have been in serious financial difficulty if Chernak's decision had not been reversed. According to Union Co-President Kahn, his organization decided to attempt to finance further publication out of donations from other student governments and had mailed 138 information packets across the country to various colleges. "We asked for any kind of support -- financial, moral, or spiritual, and while we didn't get as much as we'd hoped for, we did receive $100 from Northeastern University, a $1000 loan from the University of Michigan, and about $260 in smaller contributions from students and academic people," McDermott noted. But when the BU College of Liberal Arts Forum, a student activity also under the jurisdiction of Trachtenberg's office, attempted to donate $200 to the Student Union, the administration froze all activity funds, in effect forbidding the Forum's action, McDermott explained, making it apparent that "what was involved here was obviously a censorship matter." Approximately $300 remains from the paper's released funds of $1200, enough to publish two issues (one last week and one on Feb. 24), McDermott said, adding that the Student Union intends to use the money donated from outside whether the remaining $1200 is released from escrow or not. "While the release of the other $1200 is supposedly automatic, nobody here [in the Student Union] believes that," asserted McDermott. "All we can do is publish one more issue and see what happens."
