Caltech's undergraduate students are renowned for their creativity, often engaging in what is called a "restack," a form of room modification or redecoration. Among the artistic expressions of these students, one notable case involved a senior's room in Fiemsing that had been restacked the previous year before. Upon breaking into the room, they were surprised to find it complete in chaos, with the floor strewn with papers and personal belongings, a true testament to the dedication and effort put into such projects.

One such restack was described by a student as "Murphy's stack wasn't very impressive," yet it was an incredible feat of organization and cleaning. The room was spotless, with the furniture returned to its original positions, and the walls meticulously repaired. The students who performed the restack expressed a sense of accomplishment and pride in their work, reflecting the common theme of creativity and labor in these projects.

The tradition of restacking at Caltech is mandated if the undergraduates succeed in breaking into a senior's room, which is a popular activity among the students. The break-in is often celebrated with a party or gathering, where the undergraduates are welcomed into the room with open arms and a sense of camaraderie. This tradition not only adds to the cultural fabric of the Caltech community but also serves as a symbol of the students' ingenuity and determination.
