MIT investigates S. African stocks

By Mark James

MIT has begun to gather information on South African investments and the possible repercussions of divestment policies. MIT is considering joining a number of other universities in a boycott of South African oil companies. MIT is considering the issue thoroughly, and has met with the administra- tion to discuss possible actions.

The calls for divestment have been increasing, and MIT is now considering the issue more seriously. The administration has met with the students and faculty to discuss the possible consequences of divestment, and the students have been quite vocal about their support for divestment. The administration has not yet made a decision, but they are considering the issue carefully.

Semi-seriously under consideration

EE Department may limit enrollment

By Nest Phineas

The Electrical Engineering and Computer Science Department is considering limiting enrollment in the EECS department. The department is concerned about the deteriorating quality of education in the department, and is considering ways to address the problem. One possible solution is to limit the number of students who can take courses in the department.

The department is concerned that the current enrollment levels are not sustainable, and that the quality of education is suffering as a result. The department is considering a number of options, including limiting the number of students who can take courses in the department.

The department is not yet ready to make a decision, but they are considering the issue carefully. They are concerned about the sustainability of the department, and are committed to providing a high-quality education to all students who choose to study in the EECS department.
