MIT Policy unaffected by Bakke decision

By Kenneth Hamilton

MIT's admissions procedures are still at variance with those sanctioned by the Supreme Court according to a statement released by President Jerome Wiesner and Chancellor Paul Gray.

Furthermore, "MIT is strongly committed to providing the opportunity for members of racial minority groups, consistent with the court's decision, [the Institute] will continue to make a determined effort to increase their number among the MIT student body."

The statement was released following the Supreme Court's decision in the Bakke case. The case has been called the most important civil rights case of the past two decades. It attracted millions of dollars in legal fees and the attention of the entire nation.

The Bakke decision, which was handed down by the Supreme Court, requires that institutions of higher education balance affirmative action programs with other measures to ensure that minority students are afforded meaningful access to higher education.
