Quiet end of the Sixties

By Gordon Hale
Editor's Note: This is the last of a four-part series looking back at events at MIT during the 1960's.

The other major issue during this period was the future of the Committee on Discipline. Students accused the Dean for Student Affairs of being an 'upstanding jurist and prosecutor in disciplinary hearings held by the COD. In March 1970, in response to these charges, the Discipline Committee adopted a proposal for internal reform presented by Professor of Professors of Materials Science and Engineering Roy Kaplow and Professor of Physics Louis S. Osborne.

The changes switched the role of the COD from one of reviewing the General Assembly's decision to a one of reviewing the General Assembly's decision. The COD's decision was then appealed to a new body called the COD, which was created by the COD and was composed of other faculty members.

Although these changes were recognized by the General Assembly as a step in the right direction, they were criticized by the COD. The COD felt that its role should be expanded to include the preparation of cases for both parties. They also saw the new COD as an example of how to handle discipline cases.

On March 5, 1971, former President Wiesner was elected president by the COD. He had been a former presidential candidate and was returned to MIT for reasons of employment — in case I want to get a teaching job.

The changes switched the role of the COD from one of reviewing the General Assembly's decision to a one of reviewing the General Assembly's decision. The COD's decision was then appealed to a new body called the COD, which was created by the COD and was composed of other faculty members.

Although these changes were recognized by the General Assembly as a step in the right direction, they were criticized by the COD. The COD felt that its role should be expanded to include the preparation of cases for both parties. They also saw the new COD as an example of how to handle discipline cases.

On March 5, 1971, former President Wiesner was elected president by the COD. He had been a former presidential candidate and was returned to MIT for reasons of employment — in case I want to get a teaching job.