MIT vs Technical Union

Labor union grievances with MIT

To the Editor

Lab Service Workers' Union, the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations, submitted a formal grievance to MIT when it discovered that one of its employees was receiving wages that were below the minimum wage. The union had filed a complaint with the Massachusetts Department of Labor Relations, and the grievance was subsequently referred to the Labor Relations Board of Massachusetts. The union's position was that the employee was being underpaid, and the employer's position was that the employee was being paid according to the terms of their collective bargaining agreement.

MIT administration response to union

On October 25, we wrote to the Union on October 17 requesting that the grievance be held in abeyance until January 1. The Union requested that the grievance be held in abeyance until January 1, and the employer agreed to this request.
