Talk to us last.

Ask the other computer companies some tough questions about their training programs, their attitudes about "going by the book:, promotions, profit-sharing and the importance of the individual.

Then ask us the same questions.

Careers in computer marketing.

At Hewlett-Packard, our computer sales are growing dramatically. So career opportunities are wide open for sales representatives, systems and customer engineers. We’re looking for people with a science degree, plus an MBA. Or a marketing degree with some computer background. Or an engineering degree with an interest in marketing.

There are a lot of things about HP you’ll like. For instance, it’s our policy to promote from within rather than hiring over your head from outside. We share profits with everyone. (The last semi-annual bonus was more than $24 million.) We’ve never had a lay-off in our 4-year history. And our sales are approaching $2 billion.

But you can’t learn very much about us from an ad. So representatives from Hewlett-Packard will be holding interviews at your school on February 15.

That gives you enough time to check out the other computer companies. And to check with your placement office to arrange an appointment. Or write to Hewlett-Packard, Attn: Larry Amsden, 11000 Wolfe Road, Cupertino CA 95014.

Then let’s talk.

Preston Ford (BSEE, MIT, MBA, Harvard)

HP Sales Representative

"There is a lot of difference from one company to the next as to whether they treat sales people as order takers or as important people. ... HP does a good job of giving you the support and training and guidance you need to do the job right."
