could be doing them more harm than good, and it doesn't help when Brooks films Gredin (who is a vet) operating on a horse in a funny sequence in which the horse dies because of a stupid error by Gredin. Brooks also has troubles with the team of psychologists he hired to give his project credibility. They continually have fights in board meetings, which usually deteriorate into name-calling sessions.

There are two sequences which stand out. First, there's an interesting montage about going shopping and to the zoo in which the scenes are shot in slow motion and everything is too rosy and perfect. Also, at the beginning of the film there's a hilarious se-
