Can registration be justified

(Continued from page 4)

seems that the majority in Congress may not share my view. This country could end up appearing amusing rather than menacing to the Russians if we attempt to demonstrate our national resolve and unity by spending months squabbling over whether or not to draft women. Of course, haggling over administrative "details" is pointless without first justifying the existence of draft registration. Why is it necessary to take this step now? The consensus seems to be that it's just one of the series of steps taken recently to indicate the likelihood that registration will be followed by actual conscription. Another possible justification paral—

As the situation now stands, therefore, it can be certain that the registration will be a responsibility for every citizen. The arguments for mandatory national service for young people serving in the armed forces is considered to be a responsibility of every citizen. The first justification parallels the fact that proposals dealing with registration surfaced last spring, before most people had even heard of Afghanistan. One indication of this is the fact that proposals dealing with both registration and conscription surfaced last spring, before most people had even heard of Afghanistan. One of the problems is a continuing concern over the health of the anti-draft forces. Of course, registration only addresses this problem if one assumes that registration will be followed by actual conscription. Another possible justification parallels the arguments for mandatory national service for young people serving in the armed forces.

Unfortunately, it appears that the reasons for the renewed interest in registration are more complex than mere registration-hating. One indication of this is the fact that proposals dealing with both registration and conscription surfaced last spring, before most people had even heard of Afghanistan. One of the problems is a continuing concern over the health of the anti-draft forces. Of course, registration only addresses this problem if one assumes that registration will be followed by actual conscription. Another possible justification parallels the arguments for mandatory national service for young people serving in the armed forces.

The consensus seems to be that it's just one of the series of steps taken recently to indicate the likelihood that registration will be followed by actual conscription. Another possible justification parallels the fact that proposals dealing with registration surfaced last spring, before most people had even heard of Afghanistan. One indication of this is the fact that proposals dealing with both registration and conscription surfaced last spring, before most people had even heard of Afghanistan. One of the problems is a continuing concern over the health of the anti-draft forces. Of course, registration only addresses this problem if one assumes that registration will be followed by actual conscription.

As the situation now stands, therefore, it can be certain that the registration will be a responsibility for every citizen. The arguments for mandatory national service for young people serving in the armed forces is considered to be a responsibility of every citizen.