Activists: A Desire in search of a cause

The Link. A communications line. "The nervous system for a democracy - a link for creative thinkers - to fuse creative thinkers a place to write." Yes, there is, in fact, to be another newspaper on the MIT campus soon. Or, at least, that's what all the indications seem to point to. Another newspaper, and one willing to do investigative projects as well, according to its organizer, David Kuller '81. Kuller, whose description of the new paper's goals are quoted above, is planning to distribute the first issue of The Link on Wednesday. Wonderful. This paper has sorely needed an alternative newspaper on this campus over the years, and is sold to serve the sake of a sex survestigative reporting and creative writing - a new outlet for aggressive and vocal activity.

Newsprint is expensive, though, and here's the story becomes somewhat interesting. Kuller's enthusiasm for the first issue run about $500, of which $150 has been raised already. This $510 has come from donations. Donations from one student ($3) and four faculty members, according to Kuller. That's $145 from four faculty members, and plans to run nioost of what is created on March 4, 1969 - a day which served as a culmination of organizing the paper (it will operate with a committee structure) are out of the question. Although Kuller reports that the Writing Program and the Council for Cultural Affairs are involved with March 4, although both claim that is the only tie that Chorover and Kuller, is that many people involved with Chorover, a leading platform for creative thinkers, a link among creative minds. It cannot, and should not, serve as a link between the Darin and the Darin.

Steve Solnick

There are no years of serious, probing thought leading up to March 4, 1980. There are, instead, memories of the same date years ago. Perhaps that is why the most vocal organizers of March 4, 1980, have been faculty, although students have certainly been involved. Last week's rally was largely student organized, and yet the Beatles music and the Tom Lehrer songs and the faces from the states left little doubts what was really being trickled. The un-erverations, indeed, were the place to be during the six-s and those who lived through it seem to miss being in the spotlight of the nation's attention.

Those who didn't live through the sixties, though, seem to be another case altogether. Anti-culture chants erupted at the draft rally. Stop the Draft lobbies circulated to oppose registrations, not out of a deep moral outrage, but rather out of... what? A Desire in Search of a Cause. That seems to be the phrase to describe the anti-draft/anti-nuke circle. To the Editor?

The attitude of appeasement, detente, and cowards is no answer to communist aggression. Such an attitude does nothing to prevent war; it only incites the aggressor to provoke the very war we try to avoid. Most of the so-called "no draft" or "give peace a chance" seem to be either (or more or less) cowardly. The tragedy of the igno-mean is typified by Neville Chamberlain, who sold out the Sudetenland to "keep the peace;" the disgrace of the ignorant is to refuse to listen to dissenters' warnings or their refusal to believe that the communists ac-dually did slaughter Cambodians, did grenade Vietnamese, and did push thousands of Chinese out of the way. The cowards, on the other hand, are simply dominated by their own selfishness, and will have to suffer in the self-imposed hell of their own pinching con-sciences. There is at least a third category of "no drafters": the communists. They are different, for they purposefully use their organizations, press, and the like, to lend an air of credibility to this foolishness and cowardice. They are also in-ciduous, for they seek to hide their identity and purpose, which is to destroy the peace and freedom of the world through lies and half truths. The American citizens who have fought and died for freedom... It is time to consider just where the Christian world would be if Jesus said "Hell no, we won't go" to the cross, or where America would be if the Pilgrims said "Hell no, we won't go" to the New World. It is only because people risked their lives for God, for righteousness, and for others that we have an abundant life, in deed, even that we have the freedom to protest in such a way as to be unattainable to the sacrifice and countless brave souls who have gone before us. Dare we stain our blood with our cowardice and timidity in the cause of the communist aggressor?

Remember, while we globally protest here-thousand of others are wading through the stench of rotting flesh on the battlefields of Afghanistan so that they can bury their loved ones. Can we stand idly by? I for one will not. We must stop the Soviets now, before it is too late.

If called, I will get, And proudly!

J. Andrew Combs G

To the Editor

The Link. A communications line. "The nervous system for a democracy - a link for creative thinkers - to fuse creative thinkers a place to write." Yes, there is, in fact, to be another newspaper on the MIT campus soon. Or, at least, that's what all the indications seem to point to. Another newspaper, and one willing to do investigative projects as well, according to its organizer, David Kuller '81. Kuller, whose description of the new paper's goals are quoted above, is planning to distribute the first issue of The Link on Wednesday. Wonderful. This paper has sorely needed an alternative newspaper on this campus over the years, and is sold to serve the sake of a sex survestigative reporting and creative writing - a new outlet for aggressive and vocal activity.

Newsprint is expensive, though, and here's the story becomes somewhat interesting. Kuller's enthusiasm for the first issue run about $500, of which $150 has been raised already. This $510 has come from donations. Donations from one student ($3) and four faculty members, according to Kuller. That's $145 from four faculty members, and plans to run nioost of what is created on March 4, 1969 - a day which served as a culmination of organizing the paper (it will operate with a committee structure) are out of the question. Although Kuller reports that the Writing Program and the Council for Cultural Affairs are involved with March 4, although both claim that is the only tie that Chorover and Kuller, is that many people involved with Chorover, a leading platform for creative thinkers, a link among creative minds. It cannot, and should not, serve as a link between the Darin and the Darin.

Steve Solnick