take their name off the list. They're very eager to get off the list.

Some of the alumni were computer professionals, including computer engineers, computer architects, and computer scientists. One alumni mentioned that they still participate in the alumni association and attend events to stay connected with MIT. Another alumni said that they have been working in the computer industry for many years and have seen the field grow and change over time.

In the meantime, the group continued to discuss their expectations for the trip, including the possibility of visiting MIT's campus and attending a lecture or tour. They also talked about potential activities for the evening, such as attending a theater performance or a concert. One alumni suggested that they could spend the evening in the unused Quanacy tunnel, which is located near MIT's campus.

The group also discussed the importance of MIT in their lives and the impact it has had on their careers. Some alumni mentioned that they have seen the school grow and change over time, and that it has become more diverse and inclusive.

Overall, the alumni seemed to be enthusiastic about the trip and excited to see old friends and relive their college experiences. They also expressed a sense of pride in being part of the MIT community and the legacy that the school represents.

Some alumni mentioned that they have been involved with mit organizations in various capacities, including as board members, volunteers, and donors. They said that they continue to support the school and its initiatives, and that they feel a strong sense of connection to the institution.