Washington press office. "We just really don't know," said Milne. "There has been speculation on a "What if?" basis, but we expect to have more information at the end of the week, when the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) releases more details," said Branscum.

A spokesman from the OMB could not add any more information, saying, "We can't discuss what programs are up for grabs until the end of the month." D. Savicki, administrative officer of the MIT Department of Aerosciences and Astronautics, said roughly one million dollars has been budgeted as income from NASA for next year. She expected no change in this figure because of the cuts, saying, "I've received no feedback from any of the professors." At the beginning of this week, a working group of Congressional legislators recommended cutting $285 million from the NASA budget as part of Carter's program of $14 billion in cuts designed to balance the 1981 federal budget.

NASA's budget for last year was about $3.3 billion, according to the NASA spokesman. He also explained this included supplemental funds for the space shuttle development.

MITEO denies land-banking

MIT has claimed to be responsive to the professors. "I don't think MIT is land-banking," continued Milne, "we want to market the land and seek a substitute for what Polaroid might have developed." However, MIT has been far unsuccessful in negotiations with numerous potential major developers. "It's hard to predict what's going to happen next; it may have just begun," said Milne.
