Hold Gray responsible

I believe that these aims would be addressed, though probably not fully achieved; it appears that only the mandatory part of the plan has been implemented. Rather than promoting efficiency, the Vali-Dine plan has led to new meetings, crowding during meal hours for commons checking, where none existed before. In addition, the implementation of the unlimited salad, beverage, and bread is spurious (at least at Morse Hall). Rather than being allowed to go back for seconds on these items, students are forced to take everything on one trip through the dining halls, crowding during meal hours is becoming much more of a problem than it was in the past. Although dormitory crowding and mandatory commons are the two most obvious issues, there are some smaller ones. For example, new buildings are being erected on campus, with little attention being paid to the effect they will have on students' lives, in particular the decrease in available parking spaces.

"All of these issues point to an attitude of indifference to students ..."

To the Editor:

Well, the Institute doesn't seem to be able to come up with satisfactory names for the two newer dorms on the West Side, so I would like to propose a contest. Let's have MIT undergrads submit their favorite names for these dorms. The winners will have their names inscribed on the appropriate dorm posts.
