Italian post-quake "baby racket" suspected

Officials suspect that people are driving into the earthquake-ravaged zones of southern Italy and seizing newly-orphaned kids to sell to adoptive parents. The chief magistrate of the Naples juvenile court said his office has received reports that young children are being physically removed without first being processed by the court, to probably be sold on the black market. There is currently a five-year waiting list of would-be adoptive parents. No prices were available.
